The King's Library, a collection of over 60,000 books, was formed by George III (r. 1760–1820) and given to the nation in 1823 by his son, George IV (r. 1820–1830). When the library was donated there was not enough space to house it in the original British Museum building. This led to the construction of the quadrangle building at the centre of today's Museum, designed by the architect ...
